CARRICO BUILDING
La Plata
Private

circa 1915

Built circa 1915 by P. Reed Wills and referred to in a survey of 1919 as the "New Wills Hotel", the Carrico Building, renamed for its present owners, is the most physically prominent and least altered of the few early commercial structures remaining in La Plata. A large frame building, three-story in height beneath a hipped roof, it has a two-story, three sided bay window centered on the front above a one-story veranda with block and turned posts and decorative brackets. Two-story rear wings, one of which housed the kitchen and service rooms during its use as a hotel, give the building a "U"-shaped plan. Changes to the building have been minimal, largely confined to the front first floor rooms now used as offices. The woodwork is of heavy, late-Victorian styling.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Situated directly across the street from the La Plata Courthouse, the Carrico Building is the most physically prominent of La Plata's few remaining early buildings. Built as a hotel, the main block of the building is three-story high beneath a hipped roof. The principal, north elevation is seven bays in width, the center bay occupied by a two-story, three sided bay cantilevered over the front door but visually supported by a one-story porch extending across the front and both ends of the building. The east end of the main block is four bays deep with transomed doors occupying the two center bays. There are three windows at each of the floor levels above. The west end is three bays wide on all three levels. The porch has block and turned posts, a wood platform and modest jig-sawn brackets, the last also used to decorate the eave cornice of the roof. The main entrance door, with over and side lights, occupies the center first floor bay. On the front slope of the roof is a large cross gable with a diamond shaped four pane window. At each end of the main roof is a hipped roof dormer.

Extending out from the rear wall and set back from the ends of the main block are two, two-story wings that give the building its "U"-shaped plan. Both are three bays wide at the first floor and four bays wide at the second. Doors occupy the center bay of the southeast wing and the third bay from the south end of the southwest wing. The southwest wing originally functioned as a kitchen at the first floor level and has a large interior chimney at the south end. Both have shed roofed extensions on their inside back walls. The windows of the wings frame sash of 6-over-6 panes while those of the main block are of 2-over-2 panes. The whole of the building is sheathed on the exterior with German (novelty) siding.

The interior of the Carrico Building remains essentially unaltered except for some minor conversions necessitated by its present use as professional offices on the first floor. A stair rises to the third floor from the south end of the center hall. The second and third floors had been partitioned into rooms of various sizes, some with communal doors to provide private suites. All of the woodwork is of a type characteristic of the buildings use and age.
